

Against NGOs?

Nidhi Srinivas, The New School of Social Research

Date: January 12, 2016

Time: 18:30-20:00

Venue: Room 301, Building 10

How could anyone be against NGOs? Non-governmental organizations serve a variety of purposes and are increasingly the crucial vehicle to distribute humanitarian aid and ensure developmental outcomes. They are commonly perceived as altruistic, privately registered, expert-driven, seeking common good. However NGOs are increasingly under attack, whether from governments suspicious of 'foreign agendas', analysts eager for social impact, activists impatient with compromises, or scholars concerned with global inequality and poverty. This presentation seeks to understand whether it is worth being "against" NGOs.

Nidhi Srinivas is Associate Professor of Nonprofit Management at the New School. Over the past 10 years he has studied a variety of civil society organizations and their uses of management practices, including in India, Brazil, the United States, Canada, Mexico, and China. He holds a Ph.D in strategic management from McGill University and has published research on NGOs, critical management, and civic innovation.

Lecture in English / No prior registration necessary